

Dollar Store

If anyone thinks a dollar has lost its value, think again. With only a single bill as their budget, design students at New York's Pratt Institute found more than a dozen ways to stretch their pocket change.

Mike and Maika's Divis Table for Council mixes refined details and quality materials with the everyday look of a picnic table. Available in poplar and black ash.

Rich Williams, co-designer with Brooklyn's Fulton Street Design, decided to solve the unsightly litter box problem by remaking the container for his own feline. The award-winning Modkat Litter Box goes into production this fall.

Vincent and Paul Georgeson of Misewell, a young firm from Milwaukee, debuted their first collection at ICFF, to much acclaim. Their Lockwood chair comes with a felt slipcover option, to take the chill off the chair's metal backrest.

Brian Persico's scissors were laser cut from discarded electric saw blades.

A moulded soap dish by Steep Mantle is now in production.

Daniel Jeffries' concrete Cumulus Table molded from a plastic bag.

Satchels by Rebecca Marshall are made from oiled, heat-pressed crumpled paper bags and pieces of silk.

Yulvie candles, made from soy-based wax and orange peels, by David Steinvurzel.
