PRESSURE DETERMINES DEPTH.

We must learn to adapt and change our pressure depending on the needle size, needle configuration and the condition of the skin.

Shaders and mags require a bit more pressure than liners. This is due to the bigger surface area creating more resistance. Bigger needles require a bit more pressure than smaller needles for the same reason. The single needle requires the least amount of pressure than any other needle. One needle, the tip is so tiny that there is practically no resistance with the single, so it takes hardly any pressure at all to reach proper depth.

Sometimes on a pair of brows on the same face, we have to adjust our pressure as we move through the design. This is because some areas of the brow...like the arch for instance, can be very thin skin and through the rest of the brow, the skin is thicker. This would cause us to have to adjust on the fly.

Depth is probably one of the hardest things to learn and get comfortable with. It takes time. If you're struggling with depth and you're not around anyone experienced that can help...a good way to learn is to tattoo yourself. Sounds cray cray but that's how it's taught in body tattooing and how I teach it at the studio. Tattoo some little colored circles on your lower leg area where the skin is thinner, let it heal and go from there.

Good luck and Happy Tattooing!
