Marbling

Produced by MEG CROSSLEY and KAI ETHIER | Text by OLIVIA STREN

Ebru — the art of clouds — is what the Turkish called marbleizing in the 15th century. Moody and ethereal, the marbled paper produced then was saved for sacred texts. In 17th-century France, the official bookbinder to Louis XIII fashioned a similarly celestial paper to enhance monarchical treatises. Today, the look, which mingles a woozy psychedelia with old world tradition, has sloughed off its sacred and sovereign origins and is swirling onto everything from lamps to cocktail napkins.

Tozai Home's hand-blown glass vases in dusky shades of pink and cocoa look like cotton candy made vitreous, while fabric from Groundworks has the exotic allure and desert palette of shifting sand dunes. For a bigger statement, paper a room in Twigs' Pheasant wallpaper, which has the couture chic of a Missoni knit. Meanwhile, fashion designer Carlos Miele's collection of caftans is patterned in a whirling delirium of bottle green and goldfish orange. Billowing and diaphanous, they couldn't be lighter or breezier had they been loomed from floating clouds.
