Ansel Adams was a life-long environmental conservationist who was born in 1902 in San Francisco and spent his youth in the Sierra Club. He began his photography career in the later 1920s and is widely considered to be one of the greatest photographers the world has ever known. His famous black and white landscape images evoke incredible emotion and his controls of exposure and film development to balance light and dark are unsurpassed. He was a champion of the beauty and splendor of the natural world and it is believed that Adams' photographs helped to preserve the unspoiled landscapes that were the blossoming national park system.
