

Indigo pattern Catalogue

2022-2023

Our collections are artisanal, hand crafted and sustainably created using up-cycled handwoven antique hemp.

Our mission of keeping heritage traditions alive is an essential component to what we offer in Indigo, as well as how it is made and our order and delivery systems.

The Kekfesto (blue paint) workshops are open to print from March to late October, weather depending. We carry in stock printed fabrics and enjoy the opportunity to collaborate on special projects. We are happy to use new fabrics if they meet the dimensional requirements of our printers. There are hundreds of old hand-crafted pattern dyes to choose from. Our collections reflect our curation – design esthetic and are not limited to what you see here.

A description of the indigo printing process and our experience with the dyers follows. It is indicative of how Eastern Europe and in particular Hungary translated a craft born in India and assimilated eventually throughout Europe. The cross-cultural implications are fabulous.

Indigo print making in Hungary is created using the wax resist method. Each design requires a dye pattern – typically more than one. Some of the modern pieces are done on rolls or horizontal dyes. It is a delicate process. Everything has to be calibrated to work in harmony: the recipes for the wax, the time in the dye bath, the mix of the indigo, and the temperatures of each component all play an integral part of the indigo dyeing process. The dye pattern is put into a wax bath and then used to print the pattern onto cleaned cloth. This process is repeated until the cloth is covered in wax. After drying the indigo dye baths are readied and the cloth is submerged repeatedly depending on the color desired. The weather also plays a critical role in the making of Kékfestő textiles as all of the cloth is hung outside to dry in the sun.
