11:10

Panel 1: Recent trends in Corporate Compliance Monitoring

For years, Corporate Compliance Monitoring has been viewed as a necessary complement to sanctions associated with settlements. The new French Anti-Corruption Agency is now able to impose compliance monitoring on companies. However, given that the new FCPA Pilot Program no longer imposes monitors on companies which are disclosing misconduct and cooperating with the Department of Justice, is monitoring the only remedial process? How will certification be regarded by enforcement authorities following the reference by Danish prosecutors in a recent corporate settlement to the mitigating benefits of an ISO 37001 certification of an anti-bribery management system?

Panel 2: Third parties: Due diligence versus Certification?

Corruption risk associated with third parties is on the radar of all companies committed to doing business with integrity. Most companies dedicate an important budget to third party due diligence. How do companies take into account the certification of their third parties? Are there some third parties for which an anti-corruption certification would have more value?

16:00 Panel 3: Blockchain: A promising anti-corruption tool?

Blockchain is a system where digital information is maintained across several computers that are linked via a peer-to-peer network. This time-stamped series of immutable records results in secure traceability of information and related decisions. Blockchain has already found many applications in the financial sector. Could it play a role in anti-corruption processes i.e. by tracking due diligence procedures or monitoring business partners?

MODERATOR:

• Philippe Montigny, Chair, ETHIC Intelligence Certification Committee, Paris

Jean-Daniel Lainé was Chief Compliance Officer at Alstom from 2006 to 2013 during a time when Alstom was under investigation by several jurisdictions. He revised and improved the Alstom anti-corruption program to meet international standards which included an ETHIC Intelligence anti-corruption compliance certification in 2009. The certification was considered in the Swiss court's order to dismiss. Following his retirement, Jean-Daniel was prosecuted by the UK Serious Fraud Office for conspiracy to corrupt in connection with an allegation of corruption related to the Budapest Metro Project awarded to Alstom in 2006, the year Jean-Daniel was appointed Chief Compliance Officer.
