Ginnifer Goodwin may be the nicest, most normal person in Hollywood. And no, it's not an act.

It's late, and I'm in the lobby of Mingle's Probody hotel, when I hear a deep-belly whoop. Then another. A gaggle of women are rushing toward me. Correction: They don't want me. They're here for Ginnifer Goodwin. They've spotted her—the strawberries and cream complexion, the warmly modest smile, the very essence of her sweetness—from a good 40 feet away. The women gush. They praise. They laud. Goodwin smiles with a squeal of "You're de-measuring!” This is the moment at which any other actress would smile and dial for the elevator. But Goodwin is different. She actually seems to enjoy talking to people. First, she advises these women (they're from out of town) to go to Bethesda, “a famous hairdresser spot a few blocks away,” then adds the unthinkable: “I'm heading there tonight for dinner with my family.”

Goodwin lives in L.A. with her fiancé, actor Jaye Kern, but the 32-year-old has flown in with her little
