Home workers is a portrait study of friends close to the MAKE brand that 'work at home'.

I don't have any recollection of meeting Casey and Rose; our mothers were in art college together and we were toddler's.

As children and into our teens Casey, Rose and myself drew constantly without any external pressures or fixed direction for our work.

We were surrounded by a professional family and friend's community in the Roath area of Cardiff that were wise enough not to project fixed ideas of art or timetables to follow.

Paul and Helen Horridge are Rose's parents, Paul is the retired head of social work for the Barry area and paints every day in his home studio.

Helen to my knowledge has always worked at home and has traversed illustration, painting and performance art.

A great deal of what Helen was doing from the 80's onwards was completely self-motivated very ahead of its time and not associated with any pre-existing artistic movement.

It was a completely domestic art-form built out of the drive to experiment with different media's and forms including DIY costume.

Helen would dress in home-made Avant guard outfits and go into Cardiff city centre in the middle of the night on the weekend and act something out and see what happens.

Anyone who has been to Cardiff city centre on the weekend on an evening would know that this is pretty challenging place to be, especially if you are dressed as a rubbish dump and slowly moving across the stained city centre floor at 1am on Saturday morning.

I met Siena when I was around 18, Sienna's aunt Babs was a TV makeup artist and worked with my father while he was a props man at HTV Cardiff.

She was maybe 14 and already had her own brand of style and was painting consistently and at volume.

Siena was from Bermondsey London and sounded like it, later when I went to college in London it was her whom introduced me to dodgy after hours drinking clubs including Pharoh's in...

Siena exhibits her sexual/political ink paintings globally and licences prints to brands including hysteric glamour and for MAKE in 2021.

Casey is an illustrator and film maker and works on large scale video music and documentary productions and the more important work of underground fanzines and experimental video.

Rose is a graphic artist and illustrator specialising in book covers and surface design.

Rose is also a seamstress and creates garments to order for everyday wear and costume with an emphasis on fine detail and hand sewing.

For Home Workers MAKE works with its immediate community in South Wales to expand the notion of 'beauty in restriction' a term coined by the MAKE team to reflect the action of making product from surplus materials only.

All of the artists are close personal friends as well as co-collaborators with work either in the current MAKE range or in the late 2020 offering.
