A new batch of beauty products adds Nature to the ingredient list

Sumbody to Love

Deborah Burnes and Kila Peterson, the self-styled "body chefs" behind the two-year-old Sumbody brand, are out to change the image of all-natural beauty. And if their latest crop of pure-enough-to-eat home-spa fare is any indication, they're well on their way. Take the new Egg Noggin' Salt Scrub and Pecan Pie Mask (but not from our stash, please); while these complexion boosters are decidedly fun and luxurious, they're also serious about results. "We make sure our ingredients have the right molecular breakdown to be used effectively by your skin," says Burnes.

Because both partners are adamant about keeping the line handmade—an ethos that requires small batches—don't expect widespread availability, or even a local purveyor. For now, getting your hands on these scrubs, masks, and bath potions (we love the honey blends pictured here), means making a pilgrimage to a deliciously fragrant Sumbody store in San Francisco, Sebastopol, or Healdsburg, California... or a visit to the brand-new website www.sumbody.com.
