There once was a little girl, named Amia, who lived on a very straight street, in a very square town. The streets did not wind, nor did they turn. The houses were in equal rows of equal size. No one ever got lost, nor were packages misdelivered. Each neighbor knew where each neighbor lived. Life in this town was simply simple.

Now, Amia loved many things little girls do, but one thing Amia absolutely loved was snow. She loved its texture, its wetness. She loved how it tingled of cold yet melted in her fingers. Amia loved the feeling of softness under her when she laid in it, or when it fell gently on her face.

Amia had a plan! I'm going to get up before everyone wakes. My footprints will be the first on the sparkling flakes of white, coating the sidewalks.

The simply simple town was no longer simple. People were angry. Order must be restored! A town meeting was called. Amia's father addressed the crowd. "Amia is very sorry. We are not sure how this is happening or why." "This is unacceptable!" one yelled. "An abomination." "All the snow cannot disappear," a second complained. "You must keep her inside when it snows," professed a third. "This can never happen again or she is no longer welcome in Tuntle Town."
