This special issue of This Week in Palestine themed "Celebrating Culture in the State of Palestine" is sponsored by the United Nations Development Programme / Programme of Assistance to the Palestinian People in partnership with UNESCO. The views expressed in this publication are those of the author(s) and do not necessarily represent those of the United Nations, including UNDP and UNESCO, or their Member States.

This issue simply bursts with content, and the abundance of its material is an appropriate reflection of the importance of culture in the lives of Palestinians. In addition to a rich history with religious significance, historic sites, architectural treasures, traditional landscapes, as well as cultural artifacts and heritage, this small piece of land features two sites on the UN List of Cultural Heritage in Danger and is considering and preparing to nominate another eleven (of possibly twenty) sites for the World Heritage List. Arts and crafts have long served not only as enrichment to Palestinian lives but also as an assertion of identity and as a means for exercising and expressing steadfastness and resistance – which carries added significance in East Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip.

You will find many examples and stories of beautiful, inspiring, successful initiatives, enterprises, and cooperation in cultural activities, artistic endeavor, and support for the arts. Many art festivals are held annually in the month of July. Let yourself be inspired to visit and enjoy!

Other articles highlight how urgently it is necessary to give the arts increased, yet well-deserved, attention and support. A number of such initiatives and programs are under way, and on behalf of the Palestinian people, TWiP would like to thank their local and international audiences, supporters, and donors. In the recently adopted Sustainable Development Goals 2030, the international community has for the first time recognized how important and positive a contribution the arts can make to economic development and to the securing and increasing of livelihoods for youth, women, and disadvantaged members of a society and society at large. Diplomacy has long recognized the importance of culture in promoting the positive image of a country, in seeking to increase trade and tourism to secure incomes for a county's citizens, and in forging and fostering international relations to promote mutual understanding and peace.

There are too many authors in this issue to mention or thank them individually, however briefly (to fit all articles, we had to cut all listings, shorten some articles, and decline the acceptance of others). I would like to thank our authors collectively instead, and invite our readers to delve immediately into the material that has been so generously provided. Last, but not least, sincere thanks we would like to express also to our sponsors in this issue, the United Nations Development Programme / Programme of Assistance to the Palestinian People (UNDP/PAPP) and UNESCO!

From the entire team at TWiP, we wish you a good summer!

Sincerely, Tina Basem

Jerusalem, the Occupation, and Culture

By Mahmoud Muna

Since 1967, Jerusalem has become a torn city, divided and confused, stressed and angry, hard to charm – and impossible to understand. During the last fifty years of occupation, Israel has tried every single trick in the book to change the character of the city, to destabilize its community by strangling its economy and reinventing the historical narrative, by manufacturing archaeological artifacts and manipulating biblical references. The Arab League, on the other hand, in an attempt to reconcile their failure towards the city, nominated Jerusalem as the 2009 Cultural Capital of the Arab World, a declaration that subsequently was extended, declaring that Jerusalem is to remain the cultural capital until its liberation from the Israeli occupation.

While some will argue that Israel has managed to Judaize the city, many consider the obvious and strong presence of an Arab population as a testimony to the failure of complete eradication of the Arab identity of the city. However, many of the close to 300,000 Palestinian residents in the city are under intense social and financial pressure, which is exerted intentionally in order to force them to leave and seek life somewhere else, where they will face less stress and hardship.

To maintain their vibrant and lively presence in the city, Jerusalemites frequently look to an unusual avenue for hope: Culture. Banking on the power of culture when forced to live under a culture of power, many consider the arts and cultural engagement as their last defense against alienation, fragmentation, and displacement. Whereas in most parts of the world culture serves as a form of entertainment, in Jerusalem culture has become not only a vehicle for social and political change, even more it is a strong and steady assertion of identity. For cultural planners and managers, culture has become synonymous with sumud, Arabic for resilience and steadfastness.

The general lack of funding, and the restrictions associated international donors providing the main financial support of cultural events, have generated a feeling of unworthiness and lack of appreciation among local artists and writers. They are increasingly driven to seek opportunities for talks, exhibitions, and performances abroad. Rather than encouraging participation in the local cultural sphere, the donor-driven atmosphere is fostering intellectual emigration.

Al Quds, Jerusalem Festival.

With this additional objective, cultural planners and executives are presented with a set of both opportunities and challenges. Challenges stem from the need for a new way of thinking, an alternative philosophy, and a different strategy of implementation. Jerusalem's cultural institutions are asked to think both on the micro and macro levels; they must achieve the organization's own aims and objectives while simultaneously staying in harmony with the larger national aspirations to which their society can relate. In some fields, this is easily done. For example, literature, photography, theatre, and cinema are rather close to people's daily reality. But genres such as conceptual art or modern performance art are facing more challenges.

A total of eight cultural institutions are active in East Jerusalem: a theatre, a museum, a music school, two art galleries, a multidisciplinary culture center, and two bookshops. However, a prevailing lack of sources to provide funding and the absence of a collective strategy to remedy this situation are forming a vacuum that is currently filled by international organizations, diplomatic missions, and the small but growing private sector. But funding from international organizations generally comes with strings attached: the allocations are seasonal, themed, and frequently politically motivated,

On the other hand, the independence of cultural organizations from official state institutions is in itself a welcome state of affairs, and ideally it should provide a number of opportunities. Freedom from bureaucratic constraints and ministerial procedures should grant the fluidity to act quickly and to maneuver rather speedily. Furthermore, it should allow the space, both physically and virtually, to be creative and inspirational in term of ideas and projects. What remains a frequently unsurmountable challenge is the uncertainty of funding.

primary challenge is the lack of an audience – which contributes to the assumption that Jerusalemites do not appreciate or participate in culture. This conjecture is not only factually inaccurate but also insulting. Jerusalemites are known for their sophistication in general and for a cultured past in particular; it would be more accurate to say that Jerusalemites no longer attend cultural activities en masse because they do not see the value and relevance of the activities on offer – particularly when many of these activities are made available to fulfill the agendas and objectives of international donors.

Thus, demanding audiences and challenging planning conditions within a complicated and contradictory political and social landscape have resulted in the phenomenon of cultural migration to cities around Jerusalem. For culture to flourish, a fertile soil and encouraging climate are necessary, but sadly, such prerequisites are often unavailable in Jerusalem. As a result, another city has been presenting itself as the magnet for culture. Many consider Ramallah as the newly-emerging cultural hub. Although it lacks any historical, biblical, or archeological significance, Ramallah is increasingly enjoying a positive cultural climate and vibrant cultural scene, as manifested in its busy cultural agenda and high levels of participation.

In most parts of the world, cultural managers will argue in favor of such growing cultural competition between cities, in fact they will encourage it. However, and given the current geo-political condition, in the case of Jerusalem such a competition is dangerous and in my opinion should be challenged. The over-popularization of Ramallah and its promotion as an alternative cultural hub will indeed feed into the Israeli plan to realign the Palestinians of Jerusalem. It will help develop the notion that Ramallah is the de facto capital of Palestine, rather than Jerusalem. The fact that all governmental organization are based in Ramallah – even though twenty-five years ago this was considered as a temporary solution, to be remedied based on final negotiations – as are banks, insurance companies, and the main trade and finance institutions, further cements Ramallah's position.

The salty-sweet competition between Jerusalem and Ramallah is simply unfair, as the two cities are not equal and cannot be compared. Both cities should be encouraged to develop their own relevant cultural identity, as they have certainly much to offer. Ramallah maintains a relaxed, outgoing ambiance, while Jerusalem radiates with its heavy-weight, deeply rooted history and religious focus. However, Jerusalem should always be treated as the future capital of Palestine, and the cultural programming should reflect this desired reality.

Within these contradicting dynamics, cultural managers have to navigate their way for a balanced situation, while collectively challenging the conditions, and dictate the terms in order to break new grounds. This could be done through the establishment of an informal body or a form of umbrella organization under which the cultural institutions can communicate, coordinate and organize. This will eventually lead to a collective position and shared strategy for the Jerusalem cultural scene beyond the mere interest of the individual organizations.

Mahmoud Muna was born in Jerusalem and received degrees in media and communication from the University of Sussex and from King's College, London, United Kingdom. Known to many as the "bookseller of Jerusalem," he is the proprietor and host of cultural and literary events at the Educational Bookshop and at the bookshop at the American Colony Hotel. When not reading or selling books, he is a writer and commentator on culture, politics, language, and identity.

which leaves little room for maneuver. This donor-driven culture has irritated audiences of cultural events in the city and marginalizes local artists and writers. Local culture- and art creators who are not attractive to donors for their funding have become not affordable, even if their works are interesting, artistically valuable, or relevant to social and political change.
