BODY COPY:

Today's healthcare facilities record and maintain massive amounts of data, ranging from potentially sensitive medical information to payment data and beyond. The time, resources and costs involved with handling data management in-house can add up quickly, which is why more healthcare facilities are beginning to make the switch to outsourced data management services.

What Is Healthcare Provider Data Management?

Specifically, healthcare provider data management services allow essential processes to be handled by a qualified third party rather than in-house. This includes the secure storage of provider records, as well as credentialing and other key functions. In some cases, these providers may also handle record request handling.

Benefits of Outsourcing Provider Data Management

There are many benefits to outsourcing provider data management, ranging from greater cost effectiveness to improved patient focus. For healthcare facility managers and other administrators who are looking for a viable alternative to in-house data management, here are just a few of the most notable advantages outsourcing has to offer.

Cut Down on Costs

Manually entering and maintaining patient information in-house can be costly in a number of ways. For starters, full-time administrative staff must often be retained to handle these manual and time-consuming tasks. From there, ongoing training costs must also be incurred. Combine all of this with the expenses related to physically and digitally storing/hosting data—and it's easy to see how quickly things can add up.

By making the switch to a third-party data management provider, healthcare facilities can cut down on their own operating costs without sacrificing data management or security.

Focus on Patient Care

When there's a dedicated team off-site to handle all things related to data management and recordkeeping, healthcare providers and administrators can focus more on what matters most: providing the highest standard of patient care possible. Staff can spend less time on tedious, manual tasks (such as Medicare/Medicaid revalidations and commercial payer updates) and more time ensuring that patients receive the quality service they deserve at all stages of the process.

Switching to third-party data management services can also enhance the patient experience by maximizing accuracy and making it easier for patients to access their own records quickly and reliably.

Ensure Regulatory Compliance

Healthcare practices are faced with complex and serious regulatory compliance standards that can make data management even more of a challenge. This is especially true when it comes to following the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA), which sets strict standards and regulations for how patient data is stored, retrieved and shared.

By outsourcing healthcare provider data management services, these facilities can spend less time worrying about regulatory compliance issues and rest assured that all of this is being handled on their behalf by highly trained and experienced professionals. These are experts who are well versed in the ins and outs of HIPAA and any other regulations that may impact the facility.

Enjoy Customized Services

In many cases, provider data management companies can also provide customized services to take additional time and cost burdens off of a medical practice. This may include customized review services, which allows practice owners to determine exactly which services they wish to pay for. This, in turn, avoids spending money on services that aren't needed and optimizes the facility's budget.

Where to Begin with Outsourcing Provider Data Management Services

These are just a few of the many potential advantages healthcare facilities can enjoy when they make the switch from in-house data management to an outsourced option.

Of course, with so many different provider data management services out there, choosing the right one can feel like a challenge. Ultimately, it all boils down to exploring the different features and services that are included with each plan (as well as options that may cost extra) and aligning those with the needs of the facility as much as possible.

Ideally, facility owners should also choose a platform that will assist in all aspects of integrating to a third-party data management service. The transition process can present some unique challenges, so having a team to assist with every step of the process can ensure that the transition goes as smoothly as possible.
