OUR PROCESS

Nine-O custom garments are manufactured using a variety of processes to suit all of your hockey apparel needs.

SUBLIMATION

The inkjet dye sublimation process uses a heat sensitive sublimation dye, dissolved in a liquid, to print graphics and text onto a special inkjet paper. This is called a dye sub-transfer. The dye sub-transfer and the garment are then placed into a heat press and the two are compressed together.

CUT AND SEW

Cutting is the first step towards your completed garment. We have hundreds of rolls of fabric varying in colour and material mainly shipped from Canada to suit your needs. Each step of the process is quality controlled to ensure customer satisfaction!

EMBROIDERY

Our designers digitize your logo or artwork, allowing the embroidery machine to plan out the colours, thread count and order of stitches. Embroidery is a stylish embellishment to your apparel, adding depth and eye catching texture. With a talented embroidery department in house, we can help you realize your design faster than ever.

TWILL

Twill embroidery incorporates a thicker design using a special type of fabric, characterized by its diagonal weave. Twill is traditionally used for jersey numbers and name bars, but it's popular as text or script on team hoods. Twill is lightweight, breathable and durable.

HEAT TRANSFERS

Heat Transfers utilize specially formulated materials, printed with a design and cut to shape, then pressed at very high temperatures onto the garment. Our complete design solutions allows us to design, print and press in house for rapid fabrication. The process provides a bright, crisp, colour true image.

DIRECT TO GARMENT

Direct to Garment printing applies the ink onto the garment with inkjet technology. It's like printing on paper but on apparel! A special printer prints the ink directly onto the desired garment. DTG uses specialty water-based inks which are absorbed by the fibers of the garment. The printers are precise, therefore images can be higher detail than screen printing and you are not limited in colour.
