

Better Health, Safer Facility

There are many health benefits of physical fitness for both staff and inmates – all of which have been shown to have a positive impact on the emotional states most prevalent among inmates and staff, like anger, stress, anxiety, sadness, depression, and boredom. Studies show Jail Administrators, Recreation Supervisors, and other correctional personnel can experience less aggressive and healthier inmates when inmates are regularly exercising, leading to a safer environment.

For correctional personnel, having superior fitness is a basic requirement to perform their duties. Both male and female staff may need to demonstrate a high level of physical fitness in order to stabilize an inmate situation or protect their own life. For inmates, making physical fitness a standard routine will be a positive outlet that turns them away from drug or alcohol abuse, and helps reduce re-incarceration. These benefits will improve the correctional facility's management and social climate.
