"Zero Malaria Starts with Me - Draw the Line Against Malaria"

but a few changes have been going on. ive been taking meds for about a month and a half now. during this time ive had them upped. they've definitely been helping with my depression and anxiety. I also finally got a therapist! that I had my first session with this last tuesday. it has been QUITE a process. insurance has been an absolute PAIN. but i expected that so im not surprised. that doesn't mean this should be the norm i experience. we'll see how annoying things really get during the summer but I'm trying to prepare for that now by getting my meds, including testosterone! all handled for the summer. in terms of testosterone, ive gone from subq injections to gel! but ive talked with my doctor about the options and she brought up getting me a prescription for patches! im excited to use these bc I do prefer the everyday routine. im finishing the last of my gel and the experience has been overall good. it dried fairly quick but didn't always make it a super quick morning routine. also going into the summer, ill be outdoors for a majority of the day as well as being in contact with kids. the few times I was in the sun with the gel on, i could tell i was soaking up the rays easier. I won't have to worry about sunscreen and the gel combination once I switch to patches. I also won't have to worry about the daily showers and cleansing as much as i won't always have the luxury of showers. we'll see how it goes but im excited to have a doctor that actually went through options with me, taking into consider the work i do as well as my outdoor activities.
