Interestingly, this can be explained not only by a greater propensity to take risks in middle age, but also by different reaction of female and male bodies to stress. In a dangerous situation, a man's body produces more testosterone (which causes road rage) and oxytocin (a  $\blacklozenge$ good feeling $\blacklozenge$  chemical associated with social status and approval). On the contrary, females experience release of cortisol (which improves the use of glucose by the brain and mobilises the body to deal with stress) and serotonin (which controls other neurotransmitters and determines what the brain should focus on).
