

PATCHINO

Patchino was started with a spirit to quench our thirst for nostalgia and search to find our home.

When we were all set to start a business, we urged to do something that has always pulled us close and together. We have always been missing something or someplace, which we realized has been our home. And, gradually, we recognized that to be homesick is not just for a place, but could be for a purpose or a state of content mind. You can consider this as a cliché or wisdom – Home is where your heart is.

Patchino is a child of a beautiful concept that has evolved along with us as a young adult. Throughout our backpacking days across the world, our primary sustenance has been on bottled water and protein bars. During one of our stays at a farm-house owned by an old couple, we got into a very interesting conversation. They shared stories of celebrating Christmas with all of their siblings, kids and their families coming together to this farm; and how they are unaccompanied for Christmas these days. One of their delightful activities during those times were to make cookies and improvise each time by adding different fruits or spices from their farms. And, the couple was generous enough to gift us with cookies that they baked, which has been a savoring moment for us.

It evoked in me our memories. Back in time in our native, our mothers and grandmothers used to sit together to make our delicacies; we still cherish those good times. Even before advent of microwave oven and fancy cookers, in our early childhood, they used to bake cakes and other native snacks on charcoal and mud stoves. It has always been a feast as the women sat together with dedication to the making and baking of the delicacies. Warmth from the stove, aroma of freshly baked snacks with spices and glimpses of cooking fiesta forms the feeling of home for us now.

A photograph of a tray of chocolate cookies and a glass of milk. The cookies are arranged in a rectangular tray in the foreground. To the right is a tall glass filled with milk. The background is dark with warm, glowing string lights. A white decorative banner with the word 'PRODUCTS' is centered in the middle of the image.
