

Book Reviews

Loving and Serving Your Local School

Matt Brown

Grove £3.95 pbk

9781788270793

Matt Brown brings extensive experience in leading youth projects in secondary schools to this publication. He writes persuasively about why the church should get involved with work in schools: the church's imperative to go out into the community synchronises with school concerns for spiritual, moral, social and cultural development, the required focus on British values, and increasing pressures on the emotional health of young people. He moves on to how the involvement might proceed from the well-established precedents of RE lessons, assemblies and lunch clubs to newer options such as prayer spaces or mentoring. A Grove booklet has space for rationale and recommendation, and both are done well in this edition. There is no space for detailed resources. There are quite a lot of tips on initial contact, and no more than the briefest of mentions of essential safeguarding, but it is the pointers to useful websites – often in the footnotes – that are really essential to those Readers who will be encouraged by this booklet to start equipping themselves to love and serve their local school.

ROSIE MEDHURST

is a memoir, based around Britain's religious events. Celtic Christianity re-enactment, enrichment for explain, based PhD degree, v practices. Some hermit or pra naked up to t outstretched traces back to the desert Fathers bringing of fo Christian use conformity to discarded, the Throughout t Christian ven creation, with tune. This is a meandering, early history of Britain from JOHN NICHOLSON