As discussed above, this drug displays insignificant anabolic features thus commonly referred to as an androgenic steroid. Just like DHT, its parent compound, Proviron is broken down and metabolised into inactive metabolites rapidly immediately the muscle tissues absorb it. This is the main reason why it has weak anabolic activities.

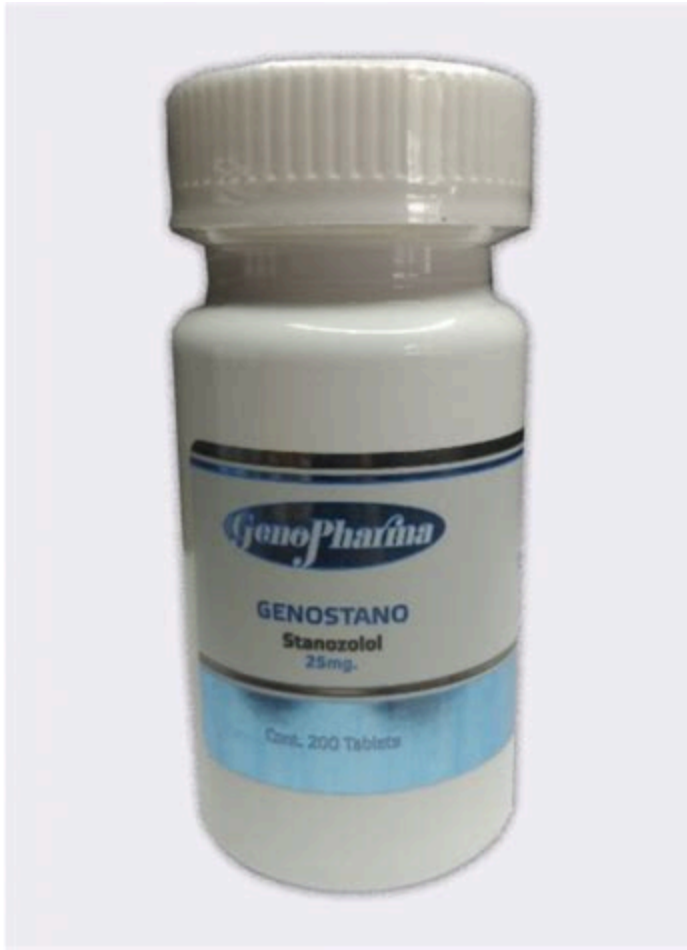

The enzyme 3-hydroxysteroid dehydrogenase, which is highly concentrated in the muscle tissues, bind to dihydrotestosterone and converts it into a blend with zero anabolic effects. Proviron, therefore, becomes a very weak anabolic steroid. Rumours among bodybuilders have it that Proviron bars androgen receptors found in the muscle tissue thus making its anabolic activities weak. Scientifically, this is not the case.

Mesterolone features a superb affinity for Sex Hormone Binding Globulin (SHBG), a protein that attaches itself to anabolic steroids, such as testosterone, making them inactive. When Proviron is used together with other anabolic steroids, it boosts the effects and activities of the anabolic steroids through this process. In the end, more testosterone is free to perform its function in the body.

Proviron can interact with the enzyme that converts testosterone to estrogen, also known as aromatase enzyme. This steroid hinders aromatase activity by binding itself to the aromatase enzyme and therefore preventing estrogenic side effects. Its anti-estrogenic effects may not be as powerful as those of an Aromatase Inhibitor, but the effect is notable. The levels are dependent on the type of cycle a bodybuilder undertakes.
