4. Stick to the point

Another mistake that new writers make is that they discuss too many irrelevant points. While writing an essay, keep your thesis statement in mind and stick to it. If you realize that you have diverted from your main point, delete those sentences which do not reinforce your claim, no matter how good those sentences are. An essay is a meaningful piece of writing that is intended to make a claim, inform, or persuade. If parts of your essay are beside the point, get rid of them. In simple terms, remove everything that does not support, explain or illustrate your point.

5. Eliminate adverbs

Adverbs are words that modify verbs. Adverbs are used to strengthen weak verbs. Adverbs make your writing gawky and they should be avoided as much as possible. Adverbs such as ‘extremely’, ‘completely’, etc., should not be used or used sparingly. When you use strong verbs instead of adverbs, your writing becomes significantly better. However, keep in mind that adverbs are not always bad. Use them in places where they are needed but use them with caution. This essay writer service uses adverbs really cautiously.

6. Use transition sentences

Transition sentences help to create a logical flow in your essay. These explicit connections increase the organization of the essay and they help the reader to understand the relationship between different ideas in an essay. Transition sentences are important in essay writing because they are signs that bridge ideas within an essay.

7. Don't use complicated words

While writing an essay, being grandiloquent is the ultimate sin. Using extravagant language will not help you to persuade your audience, so unnecessary and bombastic words should be avoided as much as possible. Write with simple language and clear language so that your audience can understand you without looking up words in the dictionary. Some people use words that they don't fully understand, which backfires because the words do not mean what they think they mean. In such cases, using big words works against you.
