*beat those
january blues...

I'm not quite sure why jeans shopping always gets such a bad rap – for me, picking up a new pair of skinnies is a snip compared to the trauma of stepping into the changing room to try on lingerie. I'm English... we don't really DO sexy in the same way that for example, a French girl would. Little scraps of silk and wisps of chiffon? Forget it! Give me a pair of cotton undies from M&S and I'm, well, I wouldn't say happy exactly, but I'm comfortable... and that's what it's all about right?

And finding a bra? Well, that is my absolute greatest challenge, as if you're not a totally standard size in this town, it can be tough to find options – if I find my size, I buy it, regardless of what it looks like, or even really how it fits. Earlier this year though, I discovered Hanky Panky thongs, and started to convert my way of thinking to believe lingerie could be both fun (cute colours!) and comfy... but bra-shopping remained something to be avoided at all costs.
