Writing is always about creating something new and unique. However, the tradition of using common and overused clichés has become normal.

You must've noticed that the writings with commonly used clichés seem really uninteresting and not new at all.

Therefore, it is important to understand not just for the literature writer but everyone including people who consider themselves essay writers, that clichés reduce the appeal of the text. Writing must be the authentic task of an individual.

There were times when writing was not considered a burden rather it was a practice that used to help people in expressing themselves. When I used to write essay for me, I always tried to incorporate new things to impress my professor.

Things have changed a lot, now people do not find writing therapeutic anymore, rather it is considered as a tool to either enter the competitive world of writing or for pressurizing students to fulfill their academic writing.

I feel I'm perhaps scaring you. Right?

No!! I'm just trying to tell you that this is a very serious problem and this blog will help you find ways for avoiding clichés while writing.

Let's start...

Unique Writing:

Try to write a unique text because borrowed words or phrases may dull the charm of your text. People have started using common words, phrases, and even plots in their writings assuming that it might help them to enhance the appeal of the text.

However, the idea of enhancement becomes the idea of disappointment.

Write your unique language which impresses you, the rest of the world will be impressed by its uniqueness.

Avoid the conventional element of drama:

Literature or perhaps any writing portrays the dilemma of the existing society. That's why writings are considered mirror images of a particular time period.

The approaches used in previous eras must not be copied because we're not living in a world similar to the world of generations lived before us.

The writers of the age could be seen following all the dramatic plots which were once a known characteristic of some particular era.

This reoccurrence of the element of drama does not excite the audience. Avoiding conventional ideas could be proved as a helpful way in minimizing the chances of the clichés.

Change from Vagueness to specification:

The art of specifying things in writing is considered the australian writers strength.

If the writer is adding too many vague ideas in the writing and is expecting the audience to respond well. This is not going to happen!!

Because writers need to be more specific and must avoid vagueness and generalization in the text.

Cliches used in the past are not appropriate considering today's writings because they happen to be too vague for the audience.

For instance, the common cliché "at wit's end" is vague because it does not specify what is wit's end? Or what is its start? maybe it was used in a humorous way?

All these ambiguities come to this one line because of the vagueness. A good writer must avoid vagueness in order to clearly convey the message to the audience.

Avoid character Cliches:

As there are different ways through which a writer may fall for the clichés and end up being a vulnerable writer. One is character cliché.

Let me tell you what happens in this cliché. The writer intends to borrow the characters of the story from conventional stories.

For instance, in the previous, the story mainly has a hero, heroine, and villain. The same concept of characters could be seen in today's writings as well.

This cliché does impact the audience because they feel weary reading the same things with the same characters again and again.

Writers must avoid this cliché by making up their own characters with unique and diverse characteristics.

Emphasize Realistic Dialogues:

While writing you're being a realistic writer, because an unrealistic approach may lead you to the integration of more cliché in the writing.

Imagine the story through your own lens and not through the lens of the famous writer or storyteller.

You're different from them in every way, then you're expected to come up with something which is better.

Imagine how people in real life tackle the situations or conversations, then you'll be able to compose realistic stories and dialogues.

Listen and Rectify:

After writing your piece of writing or dialogues, make sure you read them aloud to understand how they will appear to the audience.

You'll come across some mistakes and cliches which you should avoid.

Find the cliches and rewrite them or rectify them by replacing them with your unique and realistic approach to the scenario.

Originality is the key to writing successful texts. If you keep on borrowing the ideas you won't enjoy the process and writing won't appeal to you as a therapeutic activity.

In academic writing, students usually use cliches at the end of their writings by integrating common phrases like "in a nutshell", "all in all", so on and so forth.

This must be avoided by either re-writing the cliches or by re-creating the new ones.
