Free Transit For All?

July 1, 2018

The government recognized that a significant number of low-income households could not afford transportation fare. To address this issue, a new policy was implemented that provided free transit for all residents with an income below a certain threshold. This policy was expected to improve mobility and reduce economic inequality in the region. However, some concerns were raised about the cost of implementing such a policy and its impact on the efficiency of the public transportation system. Despite these challenges, the government remains committed to expanding access to transportation for all residents.
