

Heather Lynn Miller

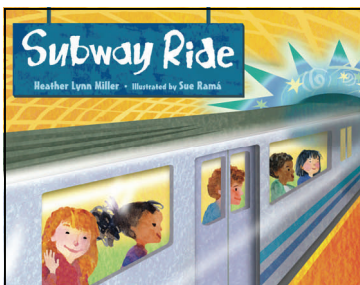

“As a teacher I strive to inspire, educate, and entertain children. My books help me reach students far beyond the classroom.”

Heather Lynn Miller grew up in Mankota, Minnesota, a small town in the Midwest perfect for children. Much to Heather’s dismay, before the start of her teenage years her family uprooted and moved to Indiana. Despite initial trouble adjusting, Heather eventually grew to love Indiana and still lives there with her husband and two children.

After college, Heather became a teacher. She began writing books after her two daughters, Jordan and Madeline, were born, and she became a stay-at-home mom. Before long, she began sending educational ideas to her favorite magazine, Mailbox, a teaching tool that she had often turned to for inspiration in her own classroom. The magazine accepted many of her ideas, and even flew her to North Carolina to train her to write a series of science curriculum books. Heather eventually began to write her own books for the educational market.

Heather wrote book after book as her daughters napped and played in the next room. After years of writing, Heather received the email that changed her life: an editor was interested in acquiring her work! Subway Ride was the first trade manuscript Heather sold.
