Breaking Gay Chains through Art

The Power of Art in Highlighting the Realities of the LGBTQ+ Community

Dallanges, an emerging artist who is thought-provoking, has just released for the month of pride, his artwork series “cry for Help”. His motto is to push boundaries. He urges the young (and the not so young) to break out of their shells and push their limits. He applies this to himself by pushing the boundaries of artistic creation. He just released a series of artworks representing this call for help and describing the need to push the boundaries of society when one is a young gay person even today in some environments.

The series “Cry for Help” depicts young men who are ashamed of being gay and are hiding. In the main artwork, the young man is shirtless and shown in an American shot. His body is painted with white and light blue stripes. His head is covered with a hooded mask striped with white and blue bands. Only his nipples and navel are left unpainted. He is depicted waiting in submission, anticipating what will happen to him, as if he were about to be executed. The painting evokes a deep sense of respect and anxiety, and the viewer feels the desire to help and save him before it is too late. It raises awareness of the weight that being gay still represents in certain communities. The background is a blue sky with a few clouds intentionally depicting good weather, to show that this can happen in an apparently peaceful environment.

The artworks showcase the artist's mastery of digital mixed media, where realism and painting blend seamlessly, making it hard to distinguish between a painting and a photograph. However, this question seems to fade away in the face of the intense emotion one experiences while looking at the painting. It is impossible to avert one's gaze without feeling the need to do something to save the young man. The artwork cries out for help.
