GLASSTONE

The only manufacturer of handmade glass in Estonia, the Glasstone factory dates its origins to the Meleski glass factory established in central Estonia at the end of the 18th century.

After a turbulent history, which included nationalization during the Soviet period, followed by a difficult period of re-privatization after Estonia regained its independence in the early 1990s, Glasstone is today moving toward a new future based on traditional glassblowing skills and modern design approaches.

The original factory was established in 1796 by the German aristocracy who controlled the economy when Estonia was part of the Czarist Empire. The glass factory at Meleski was the second largest in the entire Russian Empire and the largest in the Baltic states. Together with the nearby mirror factory, it was also the largest industrial enterprise in Estonia at the time. In 1820, 538 employed there.

By the end of the 19th century, the factory was exporting glass around the world - even to South America. After the Bolshevik Revolution, however, Estonia declared its independence, and work at that factory was interrupted.

The factory was started up again in 1922, and the company was acquired by a local businessman - Johannes Lorup, who modernized the factory and increased exports.

Needing to expand further, however, Lorup decided to expand his operations to the capital. And he opened a factory in Tallinn in 1934, at the present location. After the Soviet occupation in 1940, the factory was nationalized and Johannes Lorup deported to Siberia. He never returned.

During the Soviet era, the factory was greatly expanded and the majority of its products were mass produced. However, the tradition of glassblowing, which had gotten its start when glassblowers were originally brought from Germany in the 18th to work in the Meleski factory, survived. When Estonia regained its independence, it was possible to again privatize the company, and production shifted back to the handmade products.

With the accession of Estonia to the EU in May 2004, the company once again plans to expand its exports and the prospects for the future are bright.

The sun is rising, a new day begins There is new hope, new life.
The rising sun is also the symbol and emblem of Japan.
The Japanese rise bowl, an old traditional form, served as inspiration of the new line of bowls.

To serve fruits and sweets to your guests or just as a beautiful piece of decoration on your table.
