October In The Trial Garden

Our season is winding up quickly with an unexpectedly early first frost this week. We've been in a mad dash to harvest the last squashes, tomatoes, peppers and eggplants. We did a big mini pepper trial this year with a mix of sweet, spicy yellow and red bell peppers, as well as spicy yellow and red serrano chile peppers.

These all color up and produce abundantly early in the season and are a great choice for short season gardeners who normally have trouble getting peppers to open.

We also grew Watermelon Radish and its green-fleshed relative, Daikon Radish. We find that the type of radish should be grown in moderation in a sunny climate. We also grew lettuce and herbs such as chives and parsley, as well as strawberries, a variety of tomatoes, peppers and eggplants.

One of our favorite flower trials this season is the lovely ivy-leaf Pelargonium. We found it surprisingly easy to grow from seed and the plants have not stopped blooming for several months. This old-fashioned perennial geranium makes a lovely display in hanging baskets or plant stands, blooming in a cheerful mix of cherry-red, soft lavender and light pink. We will evaluate these pretty plants in a cold weather climate next season.
