The store, established by John Odgers and William McClelland, began trading in the early 1890s selling everything necessary for the surrounding farming community and acting as a gold and produce exchange.

The doors closed in the late 1970s until Duncan and Megan Trousdale reopened them in 1999, responding to people's keen interest in the building and its history.

Inspired by a century of retail heritage, Odgers and McClelland stocks brands that stand the test of time and contemporary goods with traditional roots. Enamel cookware, mixing bowls, classic shaving supplies and gardening tools built to hand on to the next generation.

You're sure to find something you need, either through the new online store or much-loved old store.
