Symbolism features prominently in Diane Kordas' work. Her first jewellery designs were talismanic evil-eye charms inspired by living in Greece; while her trademark cord bracelets feature simple outlines of lightning bolts, stars or crucifixes in fine diamond pavé. Recently Kordas has added more elaborate designs to her repertoire, such as a rose gold Arabesque ring with an intricate white diamond filigree motif. But her beloved symbols haven't been eschewed entirely: an edgier 18kt black gold version has subtle pavéd peace emblems that are only visible from the side. Rose gold ring £3,525 and black gold ring £3,675. Available from Luxury Jewellery, Ground Floor; and harrods.com

School of ROCK It's no great surprise that cult designer Mawi

Keivom was once a rebellious teenager. Her punky-yet-pretty jewellery line Mawi may be in its second decade, but it retains a rulebreaking edge. This season Mawi plays to type, breaking convention by launching not one but three collections: the ornate Rebel Romance series of embellished chokers and cascading crystal earrings; Deco Glam, which combines this season's 1920s patterns with chunky geometric stones; and Rebel Rocks, a subversive collection including a multi-layered emerald crystal necklace with gold-toned studthat carries a hefty dose of Mawi's too-cool-forschool attitude. Necklace £439; exclusive to Harrods. Available from Luxury Jewellery. Ground Floor; and harrods.com

CHERRY PICKED

Just because Shaun Leane is famed for his

outré commissions – think the £1.2m diamond and chain-mail glove he designed for Daphae Guinness, or his macabre Spine corset for Alexander McQueen's 1998 show – doesn't mean he can't do wearable. A case in point is the Cherry Blossom collection of romantic earrings, cocktail rings and necklaces in which Leane renders Japanese cherry flowers in delicate rose gold. White pearls represent the closed buds, while creamy ivory enamel offset with brilliant white diamonds depicts each blossom. Earrings £1,350. Available from Luxury Jewellery, Ground Floor; and harrods.com
