Kegging Cocktails

When making kegs of cocktails you will need a gas to push the liquid out through the tap. Different gases and taps have different effects.

- We use CO2 at 15 psi for cocktails with carbonated components eg soda water or prosecco, to maintain the carbonation.
- For flat cocktails like a negroni we use CO2 at a very low pressure (1-2psi) to push the liquid without adding carbonation or foam (release the pressure completely once finished for the session)
- For shaken non carbonated cocktails like an espresso martini we use nitrogen (N2 or N2O) to push the liquid at high pressure through a stout tap (one with small holes the liquid is forced through) to replicate the froth you get from shaking.

Ensure all ingredients are chilled before putting them into the keg or allow sufficient time for them to afterward before serving. This will take much longer in an insulated keg.

All recipes make approx 1 litre, multiply for larger kegs / jugs. Water is to replace melted ice in shaken and stirred cocktails
