In little more than a month, hand sanitiser became one of the most in-demand items in the beauty category. Although experts advise that washing your hands with soap and water is still the most effective way to guard against COVID-19, hand sanitiser sales have soared with such intensity that pharmacies across the globe have been rationing their supplies of Purell and Aqium.

However, even though the supermarket-variety options are about as rare as a Birkin Himalaya these days, the packaging is often decidedly less stylish and certainly not fodder for social media.

They work, they're portable, and they're relatively low-cost (if you don't count the recent sales on eBay for upwards of $200). But as a 'shelfie' tragic, I just can't quite get on board. Is it so wrong to want practical products with a side of sophistication?

THE BEST LUXURY HAND SANITISERS YOU CAN BUY IN AUSTRALIA

Look, I realise that it's absolutely ridiculous to be concerned with aesthetically-pleasing packaging when there's a global health pandemic.

But I also can't deny that Instagram has retrained my brain to view the contents of my Bottega Veneta Pouch as a stylish puzzle, with a carefully curated assortment of products ready to spill out into an effortlessly chic flatlay at any given moment.

A shallow pursuit, sure, but I'd argue I'm not the only one. If you're similarly inclined, why not invest in a hand sanitiser that's gentle on your skin, smells divine and looks good in your handbag?

Here, ELLE's edit of the best luxury hand sanitisers on the market.
