Navigating the team stops:
Even though a leader may be satisfied with the current state of the company, they tend to stop directing people. The leader needs to set expectations and keep track of everyone’s work and hold themselves accountable.

Greed takes over:
When a leader starts doing the work that should be passed to their employees, this ends up hurting themselves. The leader will become overworked and stressed, and this is when the employees are bored with their jobs and are ready to leave.

Building relationships are ignored:
Even though a leader may be satisfied with the current state of the company, they tend to stop directing people. The leader needs to set expectations and keep track of everyone’s work and hold themselves accountable.

Failing to lead themselves:
When a leader is lacking integrity or character, they will not endure the test of time. It never matters how amazing a leader may be, if they are going to endure unethical behavior based on needs, they will fall from their own undoing.

Failure To Serve:
The strongest and best of the leaders will do all they need to make things happen. Refusing to complete a task because of the thought of it being beneath them due to their title, will always result in failure.

Poor communication skills:
If a leader gets flustered at individuals for not understanding a task and does not work to make things clear, communication breaks down. All leaders should be active listeners, thinkers, and assist someone when they have questions.

Bad Attitude
If a leader is always in a foul mood and full of negativity, the leader can expect their team to act the same way. How a leader reacts to different scenarios is critical because attitudes are contagious.

Get to know your leadership style.
https://HRDQstore.com/wmls