Vacations are hard on your skin. Planes, with how dry they are, can cause massive irritation. But once you touch down, not only do you typically have to adjust to a different climate (going from dryness to humidity or vice versa can be harsh for your skin) but most people don't want to—or can't—bring their whole skincare routine with them. And the late nights that come with vacations aren't exactly necessarily conducive to taking makeup off fully before bed either. We've put together a guide to help you figure out what to pack, because TSA will only let you bring so much.

Kari Gran Mini Kit

For those who are absolutely dedicated to having a skincare routine that is at minimum four steps, it becomes difficult when traveling to keep that up. Bottles don't tend to fit under the limit, and you don't want them to break in luggage or waste expensive product transferring them to "travel size" bottles. So, even though it may be a deviation from what would be your normal routine, the Kari Gran Mini Kit is here to save you. Kari Gran are a brand well-known for their natural skincare, and this kit, which fits all skin types, is meant to last about two weeks—the perfect amount of time for a relaxing vacation.
